Reasons to visit Bite of Seattle Sunday

I've been hard on the Bite of Seattle in years past, but the 2008 lineup looked good to me, and Sunday's events and Alley eats looked particularly enticing. I can't leave a single name off the list of chefs doing free cooking demonstrations on the event's final day, because any one of them would qualify as a highlight: Peter Kuang of Green Leaf, Ethan Stowell of Union, Don Curtiss of Volterra, Bruce Naftaly of Le Gourmand, Lisa Dupar of Pomegranate Bistro, and Jason Wilson of Crush.

Then, there's The Alley hosted by Tom Douglas (showing my age and nostalgic heart, I still think of it as Hinterberger's Alley). The list of participating restaurants changes somewhat each day of the Bite; on Sunday it's Crush, Lola, Volterra, Green Leaf, Brasserie Margaux, Al Boccacino, and Gelatiamo. Again -- all on one plate?

I won't see you there, because I'm interviewing our locavore authors in the afternoon, and I accepted a morning invitation to go berry picking before I read over the schedule and learned that Divine, currently one of my favorite places for brunch, would be at the Bite with loukoumades, one of my favorite items on their menu (yes, I order dessert with my brunch). If you're on the fence, after reading this dining review of the festival from Lynsi Burton, Kimberly Chou, and Molly Mullen, you may also decide it's time to sample another Bite.
